Having greater business on his hands, Mr. Glackstone concludes that El Mahdi is reduced to a mere shadow of his former self, and that England could not stop the siare traile if she were in possession of Klartonm. As to the policy of holding in hand every resource for the threatened condict with Russia, there can be but one opinion. Nor can anybody be deceived about the forced backdown in the Soudan. The cowardly assassination of Gordon and the slaughter of English troops, which like the state of all England, are to go unaveraged.
